International Pratt Fellow

2005

*Ms Judy Rogers
CEO
City of Vancouver, Canada*

Supported by:

Judy Rogers is City Manager (CEO) for the City of Vancouver, Canada's third largest municipality and consistently rated – along with Melbourne - one of the world's most livable cities. Since she became the first woman appointed CEO of Vancouver in 1999, the City has received a significant number of awards for innovation and excellence and has won international recognition for a truly leading-edge administration that promotes community control.

Under Rogers' leadership, Vancouver has worked extensively with community groups and neighbourhoods to boost public participation and improve civic policy, programs and services. One of her most notable community achievements was developing Neighbourhood Integrated Services Teams (NIST), a unique project that brings City departments and outside agencies together with empowered Vancouver residents to help solve difficult issues in their neighbourhood. In 2003, NIST received the prestigious United Nations Award for Innovation in Public Service.

Rogers was a key architect of the award-winning Vancouver Agreement, a landmark urban development agreement with the federal, provincial and city government that has been instrumental in the revitalisation of the city's historic Downtown Eastside and played a critical role in the development of the groundbreaking Four Pillars approach to addressing drug-related problems in Vancouver through prevention, treatment, enforcement and harm reduction.

It was also under Rogers' stewardship that Vancouver won the right to host the 2010 Olympic and Paralympic Winter Games. Rogers was instrumental in ensuring that the Games include an inclusivity agreement that ensures organisers work with the lower-income, inner city communities for mutual benefit.

Rogers holds a Masters in Public Administration degree. She's a recipient of the Lieutenant Governor's Medal for Excellence in Public Service in B.C., and has twice been selected as one of Canada's Top 100 Most Powerful Women.
